The Huntsman family has long believed that giving should begin not with abundance, but with intention. Long before they had the capacity to give large financial gifts, Jon and Karen Huntsman made it a priority to serve others with whatever means they had. As their resources grew, so did their commitment, culminating in their inclusion in the original Giving Pledge alongside Warren Buffett and Bill Gates in 2010, promising to dedicate the majority of their wealth to philanthropic causes. This ethos became the foundation for a family legacy of transformative philanthropy. Upon receiving Jon's cancer diagnosis, he and Karen made a historic gift to the University of Utah in 1995 to create the Huntsman Cancer Institute (HCI). Today, HCI is one of the world's leading cancer research institutes, home to the largest genetic cancer library and numerous breakthrough treatments.

Later in life, Jon urged his children to find and fight "the cancer of their generation." In 2019, the Huntsman siblings, galvanized by personal loss and widespread societal need, made a $150 million gift to create the Huntsman Mental Health Institute (HMHI). This was followed by the formation of the Huntsman Mental Health Foundation (HMHF) to further drive awareness, advocacy, and funding to improve mental health outcomes and eliminate stigma. Through both cancer and mental health efforts, as well as supporting many community endeavors, the Huntsman family remains deeply involved — championing research, shaping public policy, and ensuring support reaches those who need it most.
